What is a squint?

A squint is an eye that turns, and stops working with the other eye. The eye may turn in towards the nose or turn outwards, or sometimes up or down.

What causes it?

A squint is often caused by long-sightedness, which means the child might need glasses. The effort made by the child to see without glasses causes the eye to turn inwards. In some cases there may not be an obvious reason for the squint, but there is often a family history of squint and/or glasses.

Will my child grow out of a squint?

No, although some squints improve as the child gets older.

Will my child need treatment?

Often the treatment of squints requires both glasses and patches. To achieve the best results, treatment should be carried out before the child is seven years old. Some squints improve with glasses alone; others need surgery to straighten the eyes.

Are all squints treated the same?

No. There are different types of squint and different choices of treatment, some being more suitable to certain squints than others.

Who will treat my child's eyes?

There can be three different people who will look after your child's eyes.

The ophthalmologist (eye surgeon) will be responsible for general eye care and any surgery that is necessary. The ophthalmologist may also prescribe glasses.

The orthoptist will monitor the development of vision and advise you of any patching required and any exercises needed to help control the squint.

The optician/optometrist will assess the need for glasses and advise you when a change of prescription is needed.
